myentertainment

Reclaiming their inner divas, one wig at a time

RuPaul and his 'Drag U' professors remind women how to be fierce and fabulous Classes start tonight

If drag queens are able to transform themselves into stunning figures of female sexuality, what can they do for straight women?

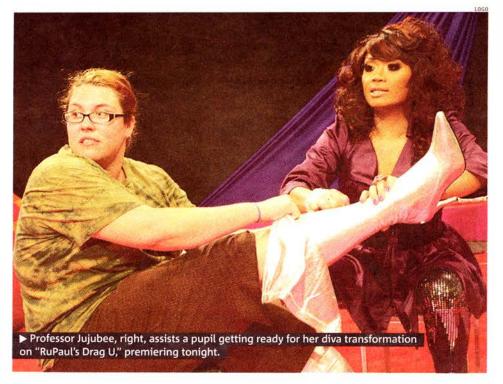

In RuPaul's new show.

"Drag U," a host of "professors" — drag queens who are experts in sex appeal and sass — help women remember that "beauty comes in all shapes, sizes, forms and languages," says Jujubee, a series professor. "Beauty's everywhere, baby."

And these drag queens are determined to awaken their students' inner diva. Contestants range from the overworked mom to the blue-collar tomboy, and the professors many of whom were contestants on RuPaul's hit drag queen competition, "Drag Race" — have just 48 hours to perform a miracle transformation involving an attitude adjustment, dance practice and plenty of wigs.

Without a doubt, the show has a humorous side — contestants are put through a "dragulator" machine that reveals a picture of their drag persona — but the impact of seeing these women reconnect

"['Drag U'] shows people that drag is an actual art form. It's acting. I'm not putting on a police uniform; I'm putting on a fierce dress."

Tune in

"RuPaul's Drag U" premieres tonight at 9 on Logo.

with their strong, feminine sides may be the most memorable impression.

"This just opened my eyes to a lot of the sacrifices that women make," says Lady Bunny, the show's Dean of Drag. "Some of these women give up entire careers to make sure their kids are well-raised. I was reminded of how wonderful a woman's nurturing spirit really is."

MADELINE REDDINGTON

Drag in the spotlight

Lady Bunny hopes the TV exposure of drag culture will increase its acceptance, especially because "Drag U" has a positive message. "This show has an uplifting vibe," she says, "which is great, because I think a lot of reality shows are quite mean."

METRO/MR